The settlers arrived at the foot of our now F Street, September 16, 1850. They camped under the oaks intents, and planned their homes. Five houses were built in the first fall and winter. The most westerly was Captain Kimball's at the now Third and F Streets, southeast corner; the others extended eastward to about the intersection of Sixth and A Streets of today. Captain Kimball later had the town laid out in blocks. He purchased much of the early town site, giving some lots to organizations and selling other lots and blocks to individuals.

The settlers planted for a harvest in 1850 only to be struck by one of the worst droughts ever recorded in California. They were forced to move to the Kirker Pass area where they could cut the wild oat grass and take it by scow to San Francisco, receiving sixty dollars per ton. This brought much needed supplies to help hold them over until a harvest in 1852. Some of the original Antioch settlers stayed around Kirker Pass, but most of them returned to their homes in Antioch

On July 5, 1851, they held a picnic at Reverend Smith's home on a bluff overlooking the river. It was on this occasion that the thirty or forty people chose the name of Antioch, after Antioch of Syria, in memory of Reverend Joseph Smith, brother of W.W. Smith, who had died in this area in February 1850.

From 1850 to 1880 the river was the only means of transportation and communication with the outside world. Antioch boasted three miles of frontage with 40-foot deep water three quarters of a mile wide to accommodate shipping. The town limits were the San Joaquin at low tide on the north, A Street to the east, Tenth Street to the South and O Street to the west. This was fined until people started moving south of Tenth street around 1900, assuming they were still in Antioch. The boundaries were finally changed in the 1930's when it was brought to the attention of the City Council that the original boundaries had never been changed and recorded in the county records. A number of early industries and business enterprises were established in Antioch from time to time. Brick kilns, coal mining, a copper smelter, several potteries and a distillery were built. In 1889 a paper mill was built on the west side of L street, north of Fourth Street.

As in any new community, some of the business ventures thrived, others flared but soon died out. With incorporation in February 1872, the town began to develop in a more orderly fashion. The organization of the fire and police departments gave the people a feeling of safety, with more time to devote to the nurturing of a healthy, growing community.
